While the poet speaks in truth, generals like love, family, mortality and nature, do not try to prove to be right or assert their truths. After these points Sidney continues to try to show that poets understand the best traits of philosophers and historians. Only the poet, contempt for being tied to such submission, raised with the vigor of his own invention, actually grows another nature, in making things better than nature to emerge or, quite new, forms why they were in nature, like heroes, demigods, demigods, Chimeter, furies, and the like: as he goes hand in hand with nature, not enclosed in the restricted mandate of his gifts, but which goes freely only in the inside of the zodiac of his spirit (1049-50). He once again cites historians and astronomers. Sidney's argument tries to raise poetry to the upper limbs and refute the criticisms made against it. However, Sidney rejects these trends throughout the writing. Sidney also states that poetry can be used to affirm a certain degree of control over human affairs and that poets are independent thinkers. Even if he is well known his literary career, he himself did not consider himself a writer and dedicated only a small part of his life to writing. New York: W.W. Norton, 2012.
